While CID operates within specific state jurisdictions, the Central Bureau of Investigation (CBI) has a national and international scope, focusing on crimes of national interest.

The full form of CID, or Criminal Investigation Department, is often compared to another prominent investigative agency, the Central Bureau of Investigation (CBI). While both entities play significant roles in maintaining law and order, they operate at different levels and have distinct responsibilities.

CID is typically a state-level investigative department, operating within a specific state or region. Its primary focus is on conducting investigations into criminal activities within its jurisdiction, including serious crimes such as murder, fraud, and organized crime. CID units are integral components of state police forces and work closely with local law enforcement agencies.

On the other hand, the CBI is a federal investigative agency operating at the national level in India. It handles cases that involve inter-state or international ramifications, major corruption cases, and cases of national importance. The CBI is often called upon to investigate cases that require a neutral and independent agency due to the involvement of high-profile individuals or complex situations.

In summary, while CID operates at the state level and focuses on regional criminal investigations, the CBI operates nationally and handles cases with broader implications, including those involving corruption and matters of national significance.
